✓ WABASH COLLEGE.

CRAWFORDSVILLE, INDIANA.

Dear Sir:—A former circular respecting the Crinoids of this locality has been received with so much interest by lovers of science and persons engaged in collecting cabinets, both public and private, that I have been constrained to issue this second edition, indulging the hope that it may be of service to others desirous of securing a collection of these beautiful and rare fossils.

It is now generally admitted that the crinoids of the Crawfordsville beds are not surpassed in beauty, perfection and variety by those of any other locality in the world. They were evidently buried alive in the ocean ooze, which, having solidified around them has preserved them perfectly, even to the minutest particular. And such is the nature of the rock in which they are now imbedded, that with skillful management in removing them from the quarry, and by experience and great patience in working them out they may be restored in almost as perfect a condition as when buried in the bottom of the ocean thousands of years ago.

These crinoid beds are now mostly in my possession, and have been quite extensively worked under my own personal supervision. The knowledge thus obtained, together with much experience in dressing the specimens and preparing them for the cabinet, has enabled me to improve upon previous methods to such an extent as greatly to increase the beauty and value of the specimens. The following testimonials will afford some idea of my success in this
